Water trees to save yourself from heatwaves.

- Trees and green spaces can drive down urban temperatures. But they must be able to draw water from the soil to achieve cooling effects
- Hyderabad: Heatwaves are among the world's deadliest weather hazards. Every year, vast numbers of people are killed by heat stress and it can worsen health problems such as diabetes, asthma and heart disease.
- Unfortunately, the bitumen roads, brick and concrete structures and roofing tiles in cities absorb and retain vast amounts of heat, much of which is released after the sun has set. This creates what's known as the urban heat isla...

How do trees keep us cool?

Trees reduce urban temperatures in two significant ways. One is by the shade they provide and the other is through their cooling effect – and these two are not the same thing. Water is taken up via a plant's roots, moves through the stems or trunks and is then misted into the air from the leaves through little holes called stomata. This is called transpiration, and it helps cool the air around leaves.

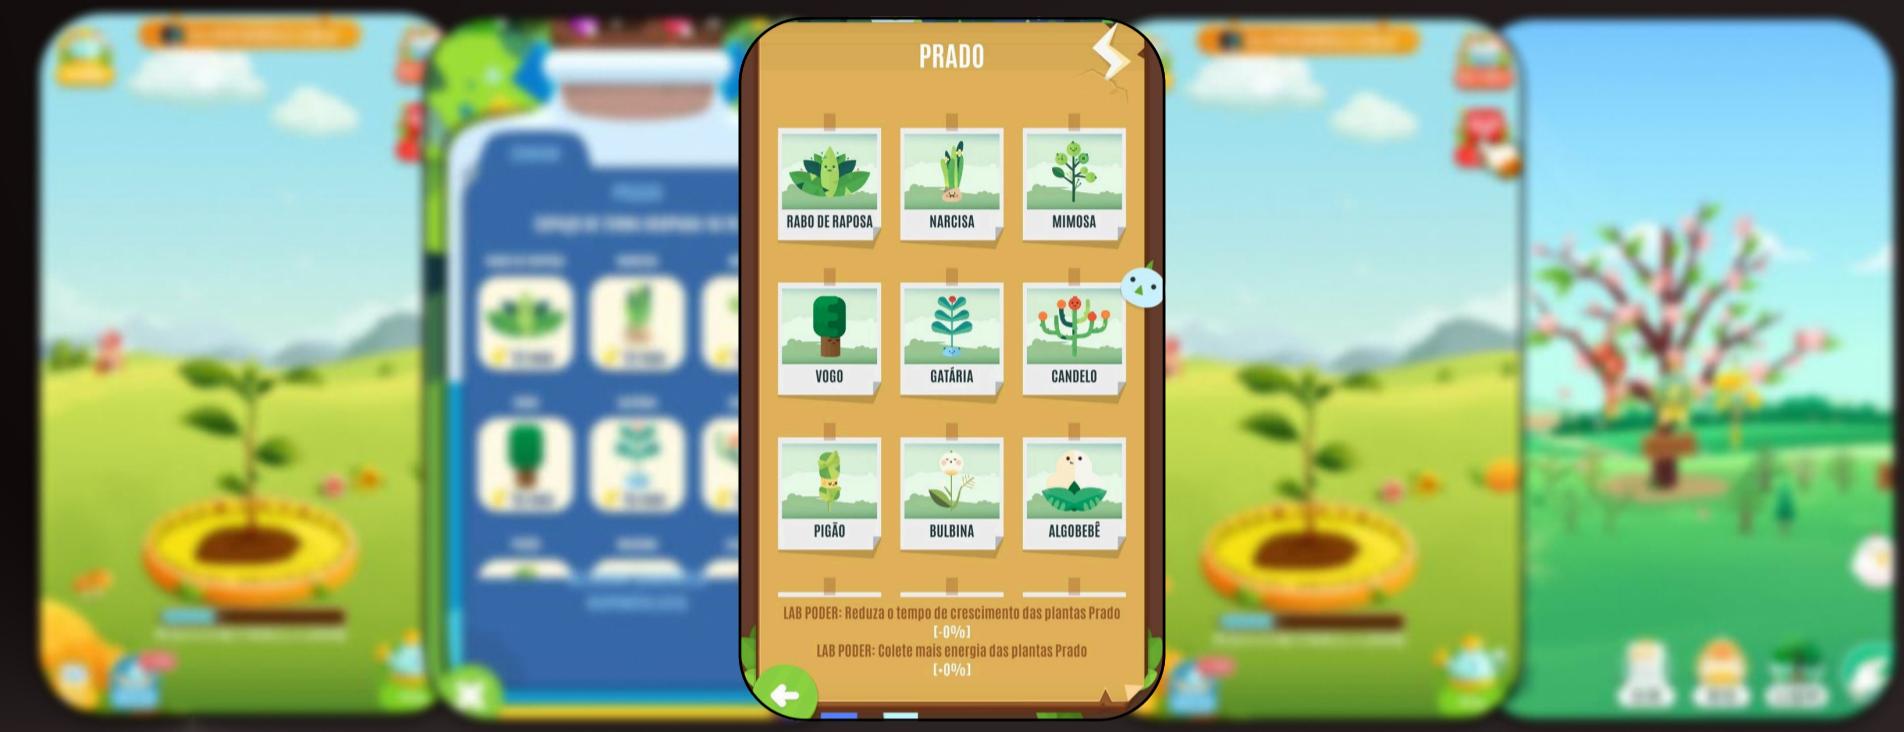

Water can also evaporate from soil and other surfaces. The combined loss of water from plants and soil is called evapotranspiration. The cooling effects of evapotranspiration vary but are up to 4°C, depending on other environmental factors.
